

I'm not robot!

home, care for children, relatives, and then they had to fight separately their battles, each in their place of work, and at a time when all the organization of work had been reversed because of globalization, there was the dismantling of the industrial complex in the United States, with jobs abroad, with State cutting services, so women were entering the workforce at the time when the roof of the factory was falling. JR: How your activism has been helped or hindered by the technology of Di day? Capital is international, so activism against capitalism must also be international. SF: It is hard to tell. But I don't think that the lack of computers and the Internet was a problem. It meant we spent more time talking to women in the street, in laundromats, and other places where women would gather. I think that was very important, the face-to-face encounters; it helped establish better communication than is made available by encounters online. Generally I think that the Internet consumes a lot of our time but not necessarily in more politically productive ways. We are submerged by more information than we can handle, have constant requests that we cannot respond to or that force us to become very superficial in our responses. In addition, I still have stacks of letters I exchanged with women in England, Italy, and Canada, and some are like articles in the ways they analyze the political situation in these localities. A lot of thought went into these letters. There is nothing like that today. That said, I do not doubt that the Internet and computers are also opening up new possibilities, possibilities.
